The first clash came when Luther defied Leo X. and stood out at the Diet of Worms for the right of individual liberty. In England the the right of individual moetry. In England the occasion of the Reformation was more political than theological, Henry VIII. wanting a divorce from Catherine of Aragon and the Pope refusing to grant one. This led to Henry proclaiming timself Head of the Church of England, and the establishment of the Church of England in the stablishment of the Church of England in 1534. Socially the Reformation was of immediate importance by giving the Crown a new source of revenue, the incomes of the monasteries that were dissolved.

He was raised to the peerage in 1940, and served during the war in several ministries; became Chairman of the Colonial Development Corporation in 1950 (1889- ).
RELATIVITY OF KNOWLEDGE, the doctrine that all knowledge is of things as they appear to us and not of things as they are in themselves, is subjective and not objective, is phenomenal and not noumenal.

RELATIVITY, Theory of, a mathematical theory put forward by Albert Einstein (q.r.), the full understanding of which is only possible to those who have had a thorough training in the higher mathematics. This Special Theory followed on the Michelson-Morley experiment which attempted unsuccessfully to detect a difference in the velocity of light in directions parallel and perpendicular to that of the earth's motion and so obtain a measure of the earth's absolute motion in space; Einstein's theory states that it is impossible to measure an absolute motion and, furthermore, the apparent velocity of light is the same for all observers, whatever their motion or the motion of the source of light, since the standards of time and length vary with the velocity in such a way that the velocity of light remains constant; the General Theory published in 1915 was put forward as an explanation of gravitational phenomenon based on a non-Euclidean four-dimensional geometry; the idea of a force of gravitation was rejected, it being assumed that a body naturally moves along the shortest line in space and that space is distorted in the neighbourhood of matter, causing it to move in such a way that it appears to be attracted; the theory gives an entirely different explanation of gravita-tion from that of Newton: it was found that there were two tests which could be applied to the theory; the first was carried out at the Total Eclipse of 1919, when the ray of light from a distant star was found to be bent on passing the sun by the amount round to be bent on passing the sun by the amount predicted by Einstein, and, secondly, the theory gave an explanation of certain irregularities in the motion of the planet Mercury, which could not be accounted for by the Newtonian mechanics; later papers of Einstein dealt with magnetic and electrical phenomena; although the theory is essen-tially mathematical a number of writers have produced books on the philosophical consequences of relativity.

RELIEF, prominence of a sculpture from a plain surface; works in relief are of three kinds: atto-reliero, high relief; mezzo-reliero, medium relief; basso-relievo, low relief.

Thomas Browne (q.r.), characterised as a confession of intelligent, orthodox, and logical supernaturalism couched in some of the most exquisite English ever written."

RELIGION, a sense, affecting the whole character and life, of dependence on, reverence for, and responsibility to a divine or super-human power, or a mode of thinking, feeling, and acting which respects, trusts in, and strives after God, and determines a man's duty and destiny in this universe, or the manner in which a man feels himself to be spiritually related to the unseen world."

REMARQUE, Erich Maria, German writer. A student when the first world war broke out, he enlisted at 18, served in the trenches, and took afterwards to teaching and later business. In 1929 he published "All Quiet on the Western Front," a vivid, realistic study of the horrors of modern REVELATION, name properly applicable to the knowledge of God, or of divine things, imparted to the mind of man, by the operation of the Divine Spirit in the human soul, and as apprehended by it.

REVELATION, Book of, or The Apocalypse, the book that winds up the accepted canon of Holy Scripture, of the fulfilment of the prophecies of which there are three systems of interpretation: the Præteritist, which regards them in the light in which the book was written; the Historical, which regards them as all along fulfilling; and the Futurist, which regards them as still all to be fulfilled. The first is the one which finds favour among modern critics, and which regards it as a forecast of the struggle then impending between the Church under the headship of Christ and the civil power under the emperor of Rome, though this view need not be accepted as excluding the second theory, which regards it as a forecast of the struggle of the Church with the world till the cup of the world's iniquity is full and the day of its doom is come. The book appears to have been written on the occurrence of some fierce persecution at the hands of the civil power, and its object to confirm and strengthen the Church in her faith and patience by a series of visions, culminating in one of the Lamb seated on the throne of the universe as a pledge that all His slain ones would one day share in His glory. REVELS, Master of the, also called Lord of

Misrule, in olden times an official attached to royal and noble households to superintend the amusements, especially at Christmas time; he was a permanent officer at the English court from Henry VIII.'s reign till George III.'s, but during the surrounding the photosphere of the sun; the layer is of lower temperature than the underlying layers and absorbs part of the radiation, giving rise to the dark lines in the solar spectrum.

REVIVAL OF LETTERS, revival in Europe in the 15th century of the study of classical, especially Greek, literature, chiefly by the arrival in Italy of certain learned Greeks, fugitives from Constantinople on its capture by the Turks in 1453, and promoted by the invention of printing, to the gradual extinction of the dry, barren scholasticism previously in vogue. See RENAISSANCE. REVIVALS, waves of religious enthusiasm worked up by powerful preachers. In the middle of the 18th century the Wesley brothers and Whitefield met with great success with their open-air preaching, and subsequent revivalists have largely followed their methods. Of these Sankey, Moody, Torrey and Alexander, Aimee McPherson and Billy Graham have been the most famous.

REVOLUTION, a sudden change for most part in the constitution of a country in consequence of internal revolt, particularly when a monarchy is superseded by a republic, as in France in 1789, in 1848, and 1870, (that in 1830 being merely from one branch of the Bourbon family to another), such one pranting of the Bouldbon Islamy to another, such as that also in England in 1688. The French Revolution of 1789 is the revolution by pre-Revolution of 1639 is the revolution by pre-eminence, but for extent—both constitutionally and geographically—it was far exceeded by the Russian Revolution of 1917. The years 1848-9 were years of revolutions in Europe, as were 1917 and 1918 and, in China, 1910.

REVUE, a form of entertainment in a series of unconnected scenes, songs, dances and sketches; originated in 19th-century Paris, but not popular in England until about 1911. They take two main forms, the large scenic and spectacular type, and the witty intimate type depending less on show

ROMANS, Epistle to the, an epistle written from Corinth, in the year 59, by St. Paul to the Church at Rome to correct particularly two errors into which, he had learned, the Church there had fallen, on the part of the Jewish Christians, that the Gentiles as such were not entitled to the same privileges as themselves, and, on the other hand, of the Gentile Christians, that the Jews by their rejection of Christ had excluded themselves from God's kingdom; he wrote this epistle to show that the one had no more right to the grace of God than the other, and that this grace contemplates the final conversion of the Jews as well as the Gentiles. The great theme of this epistle is that faith in Christ is the one way of salvation for all mankind, Jew as well as Gentile, and its significance is this, that it contains if not the whole teaching of Paul, that essential part of it which presents and emphasises the all-sufficiency of this faith.

ROMANS, King of the. See KING. ROMANTICISM, the name of the reactionary movement in literature and art at the close of the 18th century and at the beginning of the 19th. against the cold and spiritless formalism and pseudo-classicism that then prevailed, and was more regardful of correctness of expression than truth of feeling and the claims of the emotional nature; it has been defined as the "reproduction in modern art and literature of the life and thought of the Middle Ages.'

SADDUCEES, a sect of the Jews of high priestly origin that first came into prominence by their opposition to the Pharisaism arose in protestation against their policy as tending to the secularisation of the Jewish faith, or the prostitution of it to mere secular ends. They represented the Tory or Conservative party among the Jews, as the Pharises did the High Church party. The antagonism which thus arose on political grounds gradually extended to religious matters. In regard to religion they were the old orthodox party, and acknowledged the obligation only of the written law, and refused to accept tradition at the hands of the Scribes. They denied the immortality of the soul, the separate existence of spirits, and this they did on strictly Old Testament grounds, but not from any real respect for the authority of Scripture, only as in accord with the main article of their creed, which attached importance only to what bears upon this present life, their doctrine approximating to secularism. They were at bottom a purely political party, and they disappeared from Jewish history with the fall of the Jewish State, only the Pharisaic party surviving in witness of what Judaism is.

was a Calvinist in theology, author of the "Force of Truth" and "Essays on Religion," the work by which he is best known being his "Commentary on the Bible," a scholarly exposition (1747-1821). SCOTT, Sir Walter, the great novelist, born in Edinburgh, through both father and mother of Scottish Border blood; his father, a lawyer, his mother a little, kindly woman, full of most vivid memories, awakening an interest in him to which memories, awakening an interest in him to which he owed much; was a healthy child, but from teething and other causes lost the use of his right leg when 18 months old, which determined, to a marked extent, the course of his life; spent many of the months of his childhood in the country, where he acquired that affection for all natural objects which never left him, and a kindliness of soul which all the lower animals that approached him were quick to recognise; he was from the first home-bred, his school training yielding results of the smallest account to his general education; as a writer of books he owed less to book-knowledge than his own shrewd observation; he proceeded from the High School at 15 to his father's office and classes at the university, and at both he continued to develop his own bent more than the study of law or learning; at his sixteenth year the bursting of a blood-vessel prostrated him and enforced a period of perfect stillness, but during this time he was able to prosecute sundry quiet studies, and laid up in his memory great stores of knowledge. Professionally he was a lawyer, but the duties of his profession were not his chief interest, and though he received at length a sheriffship worth £300 a year, and a clerkship to the court worth £1500, he early turned his mind to seek promotion elsewhere, and chose a literary career. His early literary efforts were some translations in verse from the German, but his first great success was the publication, in 1802, of "The Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," and in this he first gave evidence of the native force and bent of his genius. This was followed the torce and bent of his genuis. This was followed the same year by "Cadzow Castle," a poem instinct with military ardour, and by "The Lay of the Last Minstrel" in 1805, the first poem which gained him popular favour, by "Marmion" in 1808, and by "The Lord of the Isles" in 1814. Much as the rise of Scott's fame was owing to his poetical works, it is on the ground of his prose writings, as the freest and fullest exhibition of his genius, that it is now mainly founded. The period of his productivity in this line extended over 18 years in all, commencing with the year 1814, by which time he had built his home of Abbotsford on the Tweed, nad built his home of abbosiors of the lweet, near Galashiels. This was the year of the publication of "Waverley," which was followed by that of "Guy Mannering," "The Antiquary," "Rob Roy," "Old Mortality," and "The Heart of Midlothian" in the year 1819, when he was smitten down by an illness, the effects of which were seen in his after-work. "The Bride of smitten down by an illness, the effects of which were seen in his after-work. "The Bride of Lammermoor," "Ivanhoe," "The Monastery," "The Abbot," "Kenilworth," and "The Pirate" belong to the years that succeeded that illness, to which may be added "Bed-gauntlet" and "The Fortunes of Nigel," together with "Quentin Durward" and "Woodstock." His later years were clouded by the failure of the publishing house of Constable and by a burden of debt, but he continued in write almost to the end, and died at tinued to write almost to the end, and died at Abbotsford shortly after his return from a Continental tour (1771-1832).

SHAFTESBURY, municipal borough and ancient market-town of Dorset, 18 m. WSW. of Salisbury, reputed to have been founded by Alfred the Great; formerly the seat of an abbey, it is now an agri-cultural and hunting centre.

SHAFTESBURY, Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of, a notable politician, prominent in the times of Cromwell and Charles II., born, of good parentage, in Dorsetshire; passed through Oxford and entered Lincoln's Inn; sat in the Short Parliament of 1640; changed from the Royalist to the Parliamentary side during the Civil War, and was a member of Cromwell's Council of State, but latterly attacked the Protector's Government, and was one of the chief promoters of the Restoration; Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1661, and later a member of the "Cabal"; in 1672 he was created an earl and Lord Chancellor, but, hoodwinked by Charles in the secret treaty of Dover, went over to the Opposition, lost his chancellorship, supported an anti-Catholic policy, leagued himself with the Country Party, and intrigued with the Prince of Orange; came into power again, after the "Popish Plot," as the champion of toleration and Protestantism, became President of the Council, and passed the Habeas Corpus Act; his virulent attacks on James and espousal of Monmouth's cause brought about his arrest on a charge of high treason (1681), and although acquitted he deemed it expedient to flee to Holland, where he died; one of the ablest men of his age, but of somewhat inscrutable character whose shifting policy seems to have been chiefly dominated by a regard for self; is the "Achitophel" of Dryden's satire (1621–1683)

SHAFTESBURY, Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of, grandson of the preceding, philosopher, born in London; was an ardent student in his youth, made the grand tour, and entered Parliament in 1694, moving to the Upper House on the death of his father in 1699, where, as a staunch Whig, he gave steady support to William III.; withdrew from politics, never a congenial sphere to him, on the accession of Anne, and followed his bent for literature and philosophy; in 1711 his collected writings appeared under the title "Characteristics," in which he expounds, in the politic style of the 18th century, with much ingenuity and at times force, a somewhat uncritical optimism, enunciating, among other things, the doubtful maxim that ridicule is the test of truth (1671-1713).

SHAFTESBURY, Anthony Ashley Cooper, 7th Earl of, statesman and philanthropist, born in London; was a distinguished graduate of Oxford, and entered Parliament as a Conservative in 1826, took office under Wellington in 1828, and was a lord of the Admiralty in Peel's ministry of 1834; succeeded to the earldom in 1851; but his name lives by virtue of his noble and lifelong philanthropy, which took shape in numerous Acts of Parliament, such as the Mines and Collieries Act (1842), excluding women and boys under 13 working in mines; the Better Treatment of Lunatics Act (1845); the Factory Acts (1867), &c.; while outside Parliament he wrought on behalf of countless benevolent and religious schemes, notably Bagged Schools and the better housing of the poor in London, where he is commemorated by Shaftesbury Avenue and the Eros statue in Piccadilly Circus (1801–1885) used in other Asiatic countries.

SHAH-JEHAN ("King of the World"), fifth of the Mogul emperors of Delhi; succeeded his father in 1627; a man of great administrative ability and a skilled warrior; conquered the Deccan and the kingdom of Golconda, and generally raised the Mogul Empire to its zenith; his court was truly Eastern in its sumptuous magnificence; the "Peacock Throne" alone cost $27,000,000; died in prison, a victim to the peridy of his usurping son Aurungzebe (1592–1868).

SHAKERS, a fanatical sect founded by one Ann Lee

(1736-84), who was born in Manchester and introduced it into America, where it is said still to exist, in 1776; so called from their extravagant gestures in worship, their tenets include cellbacy and the communal sharing of property.

SHAKESPEARE, William, poet and dramatist, born in Stratford on Avon, Warwickshire; his father, John Shakespeare, a respected burgess of Stratford, his mother, Mary Arden, the daughter of a well-to-do farmer, through whom the family and audited some property; was at school at Stratford, married Anne Hathaway, a yeoman's daughter, at 18, she eight years older; had two daughters and a son, left for London commendents. son; left for London somewhere between 1585 and 1587, in consequence, it is said, of a deer-stealing frolic on the estate of Sir Thomas Lucy of Charlecote; is said to have taken charge of horses at the theatre door, and by-and-by to have become an actor. His first poetical work, "Venus and Adonis," appeared in 1593, and "Lucrece" the year after; became connected with different theatres, and a shareholder in certain of them, in some of which he took part as actor, with the result, in a pecuniary point of view, that he bought a house in his native place, where he chiefly resided for the ten years preceding his death. poet's further history we know but a few facts; there is record of his having bought land near Stratford in 1602; a year later he figured in Burbage's company at the Blackfriars Theatre, London; there is record, too, of actions brought by him, against certain people, mostly for debts; in 1613 he was purchasing more property in London; in 1616 he appended his signature to his will, dying about a month later from, it is alleged, the results of over-indulgence at a convivial meeting with Ben Jonson and Drayton; he was buried in with Ben Jonson and Drayton; he was buried in the church at Stratford. As a poet Shakespeare's fame rests on his "Sonnets" (1609), and the many lyrics found in his plays, in addition to the poems mentioned above. Of his works as a whole, nothing can or need be said here; enough to add, as Carlyle says, "The best judgment, not of this country, but of Europe at large, is slowly pointing to the conclusion that he is the chief of all poets hitherto—the greatest intellect in our recorded world that has left record of himself in the way of literature. On the whole, I know not such a power of vision, such a faculty of thought, such a calmof vision, such a faculty of thought, such a calm-ness of depth, placid, joyous strength, all things in that great soul of his so true and clear, as in a tranquil, unfathomable sea." Shakespeare's ness of depth, placid, joyous strength, all things in that great soul of his so true and clear, as in a tranquil, unfathomable sea." Shakespeare's plays, with the date of first publication, are as follows: "Love's Labour's Lost," 1593; "Comedy of Errors," 1623; 1, 2, 3 "Henry VI.," 1623; "Two Gentlemen of Verona," 1623; "Midsummer-Night's Dream," 1600; "Richard III.," 1597; "Romeo and Juliet," 1591-6 (?); "Richard III.," 1597; "Romeo and Juliet," 1591-6 (?); "Richard III.," 1594; "King John," 1623; 2 "Henry IV.," 1600; 1 "Henry IV.," 1600; "Aming of the Shrew," 1600; 1 "Henry V.," 1600; "As You Like It," 1623; "Merry Wives of Windsor," 1602; "Much Ado about Nothing," 1603; "Bamilet," 1603; "Measure for Measure," 1623; "Julius Cæsar," 1623; "Mascheth," 1623; "Antony and Cleopatra," 1623; "Antony and Cleopatra," 1623; "Coriolanus," 1623; "Timon," 1623; "Pericles," 1609; "Cymbeline," 1623; "Henry VIII.," 1623; 1623 is the date of the publication of the First Folio, in which, as will be seen, many of the Plays first appeared in print (1584-1616). 1616

SHARP, Granville, a noted abolitionist, born in Durham; trained for the bar, but accepted a post in the London Ordnance Office, which he held until the outbreak of the American War; was a voluminous writer on philology, law, theology, &c., but mainly devoted himself to the cause of negro emancipation, co-operating with Clarkson in founding the Association for the Abolition of Negro Slavery, and taking an active interest in the new colony for freedom in Sierra Leone; won a famous decision in the law-courts to the effect that a slave became free when he set foot on English soil; was a founder of the Bible Society (1735-1813).

SHARP, James, archbishop of St. Andrews, born in Banff Castle; educated at Aberdeen University, visited England, where he formed important friendships, and in 1643 was appointed "regent" or professor of Philosophy at St. Andrews, a post he resigned five years later to become minister of Crail; during the Protectorate he sided with the "Resolutioners" or Moderates, and appeared before Cromwell in London to plead their cause; in 1660 received a commission to go to London to safeguard the interests of the Scottish Church, a trust he shamefully betrayed by intriguing with Charles at Breda, and with Clarendon and the magnates of the English Church to restore Prelacy in Scotland, he himself (by way of reward) being appointed archbishop of St. Andrews; henceforward he was but a pliant tool in the hands of his English employers, and an object of intense hatred to the Covenanters; after an unsuccessful attempt on his life in 1668 he was assassinated on Magus Muir by a band of Covenanters headed by Hackston and John Balfour (1613-1679).

SHARP, William, Scottish poet and man of letters, born in Paisley; started life in a bank, but turned to literature early; under his own name wrote many volumes of verse, biography, and criticism; from 1894 published many stories, poems, and dramas under the pseudonym of "Fiona Macleod," among these being "Pharais," "The Sin-eater," "The Washer of the Ford," "The Divine Adventure," "The Immortal Hour," and "Deirdré"

SHAW, George Bernard, British author. son of a civil servant, he was born in Dublin and educated there. At 16 he was placed in a land agent's office, but four years later he threw up his job and came to London, and after desultory attempts to enter business he began writing, and by 1883 had written five novels, but had had none of them published, and was earning money chiefly as a musician. In 1885 he became a reviewer for the Pall Mall Gazette; he also acted as art critic for the World and music critic for the Star. In 1892
"Widowers' Houses," his first play, appeared.
Meanwhile he had joined the Fabian Society, and thrown himself actively into Socialist work. the early years of this century he had produced "Arms and the Man," "Mrs. Warren's Profession," "The Doctor's Dilemma," "John Bull's Other Island," and a number of other plays, but Other Island," and a number of other plays, but his reputation for a long while rested with a small public. It was after the first world war that "St. Joan" established his popularity with the wider public and made his plays commercial successes. In 1929 came "The Apple Cart," a political satire on democracy, followed, among others, by "Too True to be Good" (1932) and "The Simpleton of the Unexpected Isles" (1934). Besides some 40 plays Shaw has produced novels, essays such as "The Quintessence of Ibsenism," and political books like "The Common Sense of Municipal Trading," and "The Intelligent Woman's Guide to Socialism." Dramatically the importance of Shaw is that he brought realism to a stage stifled by convention. Philosophically he had much to say, but covered his ideas with so much satiric jesting that his public did not always know when to take him seriously. His "Man and Superman" and "Back to Methuselah" contain most of his gospel, which was belief in a Life-force working through creative evolution, from which it follows that man must aim at producing something better than the human race as we know it, and must be rid of all sentiment (1856–1950).

SHAW, Richard Norman, British architect, designed many country houses and large buildings including New Scotland Yard (1888), the Gaiety Theatre, Aldwych (1902), and the Piccadilly Hotel (1905), also designed his our printer with (1905); also designed his own private residence at Ellerdale Rd., Hampstead, London (1831-1912).

SOPHISTS, according to tradition, a sect of thinkers that arose in Greece, and whose radical principle it was that we have only a subjective knowledge of things, and that we have no knowledge at all of objective reality, that things are as they seem to us, and that we have no knowledge of what they are in themselves; "on this field," says Schwegler, "they disported, enjoying with boyish exuberance the exercise of the power of subjectivity, and destruction by meaning the string like the destroying, by means of a subjective dialectic, all that had been ever objectively established," such as that had been ever objectively established, such as "the laws of the State, inherited custom, religious tradition, and popular belief. . . They form, in short, the German Aufklärung, the Greek Illumination. They acknowledged only private judgment and ignored the existence of a judgment that is not private and has absolute rights irrespective of the sentiments of the individual." Later authorities, including Grote, discredit this view, maintaining that the sophists did not constitute a sect and propounded no exact philosophical doctrine, but were merely teachers and lecturers in culture and oratory.

SPAIN, a kingdom of South-West Europe, which with Portugal (less than one-fifth the size of Spain) occupies the entire Iberian Peninsula, and is divided from France on the N. by the Pyrenees Mountains, and on the E. and S. is washed by the Mediterranean; the NW. corner fronts the Bay of Biscay (N.) and the Atlantic (W.), while Portugal completes the western boundary; its area of approximately 196,700 sq. m., is, together with the Canaries and the Balearic Isles, divided into 50 provinces, although the more familiar names of the 11 old lingdown states and available (N.) the 14 old kingdoms, states, and provinces (New and Old Castile, Galicia, Aragon, &c.) are still in use; forms a compact square, with a regular, in parts precipitous coast-line, which is short compared with its area; is in the main a highland country, a vast plateau (2000 to 3000 ft. high) country, a vast plateau (2000 to 3000 ft. high) occupying the centre, buttressed and crossed by ranges (Sierra Nevada in the S., Sierra de Guadarrama, Sierra Morena, &c.), and diversified by the long valleys of the Ebro, Douro, Tagus, Guadalquivir, and other lesser rivers, all of which are rapid, and only a few navigable; climate varies considerably according as one proceeds to the central plains, where extremes of heat and cold are experienced, but over all is the driest in Europe; agriculture, although less than a half of the land is under cultivation, is by far the most important industry, and Valencia and Catalonia the provinces where it is most successfully carried out, wheat and other cereals, the olive, and the vine being the chief products; other important industries are mining, the Peninsula being extremely rich in the useful minerals, merino sheep farming, anchovy and sardine fisheries, wine-making, and the manufacture of cotton, silk, leather, and paper; chief exports are wine, fruits, mineral ores, oil, and cork; Madrid is the capital, and Barcelona, Valencia, Madrid is the capital, and Barcelona, Valencia, Seville, and Malaga are other large cities. The widest variety of character exists among the natives of the various provinces, from the hardworking, thrifty Catalan to the lazy, improvident Murcian, but all possess the southern love "of song, dance, and colour," and have an inherent grace and dignity of manner. The outstanding fact in ancient Spanish history after the rupture of her long-standing connection with the Roman Empire (early 5th century A.D.) is the struggle with the Moors, who overran the peninsula in the 8th century and were not finally overthrown till Granada, their last possession, was taken in 1492; sixteen years later the country became a united kingdom, and for a brief period, with its vast American colonies and wide European possessions, became in the 16th century the dominant power became in the 16th century the dominant power of Europe; since then she continued to lag in the race of nations, her colonial empire gradually crumbled away till, after her unsuccessful war with the U.S.A. in 1898, only an island or two remained to her. Until the Revolution of 1931 (see ALPHONSO XIIL) Roman Catholicism was the official religion, and the Government was a hereditary and constitutional monarchy with a Senate and Chamber of Deputies; the monarchy was succeeded by the 2nd Republic (the 1st having existed from Feb., 1873, to Jan., 1875), governed by a popularly elected President, the legislative power resting with the people, who exercised it through a single Chamber of Deputies elected by universal suffrage and proportional representation. In 1936 this settlement was violently upset by a military revolution followed by a Civil War in which the rebels (who assumed the name "Nationallists" and were led by General Franço), were assisted by the Nazi-Fascist countries, and the Government (the Popular Front) by the Nationalists, under the Presidency of General Franco, replaced the former Government. In 1947 the country was declared a Monarchy (at present without a King) with a Regency Council to be set up in the event of the death or incapacity of the Head of the State.

SPARKS, Jared, president of Harvard University from 1849 to 1852, born in Connecticut; bred a carpenter, took to study, graduated at Harvard, studied theology, and became a Unitarian minister, retiring in 1823 and settling in Boston, where he purchased and edited the North American Review; wrote and edited biographies of eminent Americans, and edited the writings of Benjamin Franklin and George Washington (1789-1866). SPARTA, or LACEDEMON, the capital of ancient Laconia, in the Peloponnesus, on the right bank of the Eurotas, 20 m. from the sea; was 6 m. in circumference, consisted of several distinct quarters, originally separate villages, never united into a regular town; was never surrounded by walls, its walls being the bravery of its citizens; its mythical founder was Lacedæmon, who called the city Sparta from the name of his wife; one of its early kings was Menelaus, the husband of Helen; Lycurgus (q.v.) was its law-giver; its policy was aggressive, and its sway gradually extended over the whole Peloponnesus, to the extinction at the end of the Peloponnesian War of the rival power of Athens, which for a time rose to the ascendancy, and its unquestioned supremacy thereafter for 30 years, when all Greece was overborne by the Macedonian power.

SPARTACUS, leader of the revolt of the slaves at Rome, which broke out about 73 B.C.; was a Thracian by birth, a man of powerful physique, in succession a shepherd, a soldier, and a captain of banditti; was in one of his predatory expeditions taken prisoner and sold to a trainer of gladiators, and became one of his slaves; persuaded his fellow-slaves to attempt their freedom, and became their chief and that of other runaways who joined them; for two years they defied and defeated one Roman army after another sent to crush them, and laid Italy waste, till at the end of that time Licinius Crassus, taking up arms in earnest, overpowered them in a decisive battle at the river Silarus, in which Spartacus was slain. In 1914 the name was adopted by the extreme Communist party in Germany, led by Karl Liebnecht (whose nom de plume it had been) and Rosa Luxemburg, both of whom were killed in the abortive Spartacist revolt in Jan., 1919.

SPEAKER, in most legislatures the title of the officer who presides at all meetings. In England the Speaker of the House of Lords is the Lord Chancellor; the Speaker of the House of Commons is chosen by the Commons themselves (subject to the formal approval of the Crown), acts as their representatives, is free from all party ties, takes no part in debates, but has a casting vote in cases of the numbers of a division being equal; the Chairman of Ways and Means is his deputy, acting in his absence and presiding when the House is in Committee. The title was first borne by Sir Thomas de Hungerford in 1376. SPECIAL CONSTABLES, in England men sworn in to help the police in times of emergency, a task in which all citizens are liable for employment, under penalties imposed by the 1831 Special Constables Act. This Act was passed at the time of the Reform riots, and special constables were enrolled then, during the Chartist riots, at other times of political unrest, and notably in the first and second world wars and during the General and second world wars and during the General Strike of 1926. SPECIFIC GRAVITY, or relative density, the ratio of the weight of a substance to the weight of the same volume of some other substance; in the case of liquids and solids the latter is water, in the case of gases, air or hydrogen.

SPECTRAL TYPES, a system of classification of the stars, based upon their spectra; the work was initiated by Father Secchi at Rome and has been developed by a number of observers at the Harvard Observatory, especially Miss Cannon.

SPECTRUM, the name given to the coloured band, red at one end and violet at the other, which is produced when a ray of white light passes through a prism; white light appears to be a combination of light of all wave-lengths, consequently we get a continuous band of light from red to violet; if coloured light passes through a prism we get bright lines corresponding to the wave-lengths of the light present; it is possible to identify substances by the spectrum given off when they are red-hot, e.g. sodium compounds give two bright yellow lines; study of the spectra of the stars enables us to find out their composition; it is known that a substance when cold will absorb the rays of the same wave-length as those which it emits when hot; consequently white light in passing through certain substances is robbed of rays of some lengths, giving a bright spectrum with dark lines corresponding to the wave-lengths absorbed; this is known as an absorption spectrum; the study of the spectra of ionised and electrically excited gases has thrown much light on the structure of the atom.

SPECULUM, an alloy of copper with 33 per cent. of tin; used for making metallic mirrors.

SPEDDING, James, editor of Bacon, son of a Cumberland squire; educated at Cambridge; was for a short time in the Colonial Office, but devoted his life to the study of Bacon, the fruit of which was his great edition of the "Works" (7 vols., 1857-70) and the "Letters and Life" (7 vols., 1862-74) (1808-1881). SPEE, Maximilian, Count von, German admiral. Born in Copenhagen, he was a pioneer of the German navy, and in Nov., 1914, he won the battle of Coronel against Craddock; the following month Admiral Sturdee met him off the Falkland Isles, the German squadron lost, and Von Spee went down on the Scharnhorst (1861-1914).

SPEKE, John Hanning, African explorer, born in Somersetshire; became a soldier, and served in the Punjab; joined Burton in 1854 in an expedition into Somaliland, and three years after in an attempt to discover the sources of the Nile, and setting out alone discovered Victoria Nyanza, which he maintained was the source of the river, but which Burton questioned; on his return he published in 1863 an account of his discovery, which he was about to defend in the British Association when he was accidentally shot while out hunting (1827-1864).

SPENCE, Joseph, a miscellaneous writer, born in Hants; educated at Winchester, Fellow of New College, Oxford; in 1747 published "Polymetis," a work on classical mythology, but his principal work is the "Anecdotes" which are valuable as a commentary on the literary class of the time (1699-

SPENCER, Herbert, systematiser and unifier of scientific knowledge up to date, born in Derby, son of a teacher, who early inoculated him with an interest in natural objects, though he adopted at first the profession of a railway engineer, which in about eight years he abandoned for the work of about eight years he abandoned for the work of his life by way of literature, his first effort being a series of "Letters on the Proper Sphere of Government" in the Nonconformiat in 1842, and his first work "Social Statics," published in 1851, followed by "Principles of Psychology" four years after; in 1861 he published a work on "Education," and his "First Principles" the following year, after which he began to construct his system of "Synthetic Philosophy," which fills a dozen large volumes, and has established his fame as the foremost scientific philosopher of the time. Following in the lines of Auguste Comte and John Stuart Mill he takes a wider sweep than either of them, fills the field he occupies with fuller and riper detail, resolves the whole of science into still more ultimate principles, and works the whole up into a more compact and comprehensive system. He is valiant before all for science, and relegates everything and every interest to Agnosticism that cannot give proof of its scientific rights. "What a thing is in itself," he says, "cannot be known, because to know it we must strip it of all that it becomes, of all that has come to adhere to it. The ultimate thus arrived at he finds to be, and calls, Energy, and that, therefore, he says, we do not and cannot know (1820-1903).

SPENSER, Edmund, author of the "Faèrie Queene," and one of England's greatest poets; Queene," and one or Lingianus greaces, piece, details of his life are scanty and often hypothetical; born in London, of poor but well-connected parents; entered Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, as a "sizar" in 1569, and during his seven years' residence there became an excellent scholar; took a master's degree, and formed an important friend-ship with Gabriel Harvey; three years of unsettled life followed, but were fruitful in the production of the "Shepheards' Calendar" (1579), which at once placed him at the head of the English poets of his day; had already taken his place in the heat of his day; had already taken his place in the best London literary and political circles as the friend of Sir Philip Sidney and Leicester, and in 1580 was appointed private secretary to Lord Grey, then proceeding to Ireland as the Lord Deputy, and, although his master soon returned to England, Spenser continued to make his home in Ireland, where he obtained some civil appointments, and in 1591 entered into possession of a considerable portion of the forfeited estates of the Earl of Desmond, adjacent to his house, Kilcolman Castle, co. Cork; seems to have been a pretty stern land-lord, and, as expounded in his admirable tract, "A View of the Present State of Ireland," the advocate of a policy of "suppression and repression"; consequently was little loved by the Irish, and on the outbreak of Tyrone's rebellion in 1598 his the outbreak of Tyrone's rebellion in 1598 his house was sacked and burned, and he himself forced to flee to London, where he died a few weeks later "a ruined and heart-broken man"; the rich promise of the "Shepheards' Calendar" had been amply fulfilled in the "Complaints," "Amoretti," "Colin Clout's Come Home Again," the "Epithalamium," the finest bridal song in any language and shope all in the six published beater. language, and above all in the six published books of "The Faërie Queene" (1589-1596), in which all his gifts and graces as a poet are at their best (1552-1599).

STOCK EXCHANGE, a mart for the buying and selling of Government stocks, company shares, and various securities, carried on usually by the members of an associated body of brokers having certain rules and regulations. Such associations exist now in many of the important cities of the United Kingdom and commercial world generally (on the Continent are known as Bourses). London Stock Exchange, transacting business in a building between Throgmorton and Threadneedle Streets, close to the Bank of England, was established in 1801, transactions being previously carried on in a loose, ill-regulated fashion by private parties chiefly in and around Change Alley, the scene of the memorable South Sea Bubble (q.r.) speculation. The great development in stock exchange business in recent times is due chiefly to the sale of foreign and colonial bonds, and the remarkable growth and spread of joint-stock companies since the Joint-Stock Company Act of 1865

STOICS, the disciples of Zeno; derived their name from the stoa or portico in Athens where their master taught and founded the school about 310 B.C. The doctrines of the school were completely antagonistic to those of Epicurus, and among the disciples of it are to be reckoned some of the noblest spirits of the heathen world immediately before and after the advent of Christ. These appear to have been attracted to it by the character of its moral teachings, which were of a high order indeed. The principle of morality was defined to be con-formity to reason, and the duty of man to lie in the subdual of all passion and a composed submission to the will of the gods. It came short of Christian morality, as indeed all Greek philosophy did, in not recognising the Divine significance and power of humility, and especially in its failure to see, still more to conform to, the great doctrine of Christ which makes the salvation of a man to depend on the interest he takes in, as well as in the fact of the salvation of, other men. The Stoic morality is selfish; the morality of Christ is brotherly.

STOKE-UPON-TRENT, chief seat of the "Potteries," in Staffordshire, on the Trent and the Trent and Mersey Canal, 15 m. SE. of Crewe; is of modern growth, with free library, infirmary, public baths, and a statue to Wedgwood, and is busily engaged in the manufacture of all sorts of porcelain ware, earthenware, encaustic tiles, &c., besides which there are iron-works, machine-shops, and coal-mines. Since 1910, when it absorbed the county borough of Hanley, the boroughs of Burslem and Longton, and the urban districts of Tunstall and Fenton (the "Five Towns" district of Arnold Bennett's novels), it has been the largest town in Staffordshire; it sends three members to parlia-ment; in 1925 it was made a city, and in 1928 its mayor a lord mayor.

SUCCESSION WARS, the general title of several European wars which arose in the 18th century consequent on a failure of issue in certain royal lines, most important of which are (1)War of the Spanish Succession (1701-1714). The death (1700) of Charles II. of Spain without direct issue caused Louis XIV. of France and the Emperor Leopold I. (the former married to the elder sister of Charles, the latter to the younger sister, and both grandsons of Philip III. of Spain) to put forth claims to the crown, the one on behalf of his grandson, Philip of Anjou, the other for his second son, the Archduke Charles. War broke out on the entry of Philip into Madrid and his assumption of the crown, England and the United Netherlands uniting with the emperor to curb the ambition of Louis. During the long struggle the transcendent military genius of Marlborough asserted itself in the great victories of Blenheim, Ramillies, and Oudenarde, but the lukewarmness of England in the struggle, the political fall of Marlborough, and the Tory vote for peace prevented the allies from reaping the full benefit of their successes. The Treaty of Utrecht left Philip in possession of his Spanish kingdom, but the condition was exacted that the crowns of Spain and France should not be united. The emperor (the Archduke Charles since 1711) attempted to carry on the struggle, but was forced to sign the Treaty of Rastadt (1714), acknowledging Philip king of Spain. Spain, however, ceded her Philip king or Spain. Spain, nowever, cened ner Netherlands, Sardinia, &c., to the emperor, while Gibraltar, Minorca, and parts of North America fell to England. Scotland; presents a N. and a W. shore to the Atlantic, between Ross and Cromarty (S.) and Catthness (E.), and faces the North Sea on the SE., whence the land slopes upwards to the great mountain region and wild, precipitous loch-indented coasts of the W. and N.; little of the area is cultivated, but large numbers of sheep and cattle are raised; the Oykell is the longest (35 m.) of many streams, and Loch Shin the largest of 300 lochs; there are extensive deer forests and grouse moors, while valuable salmon and herring fisheries exist round the coasts; is the most sparsely populated county in Scotland. Dornoch is the county town.

SUTLEJ, the easternmost of the five rivers of the Punjab; its head-waters flow from two Tibetan Fullab, its head-water now non-most interest lakes at an elevation of 15,200 ft., whence it turns NW. and W. to break through a wild gorge of the Himalayas, thence bends to the SW., forms the eastern boundary of the Punjab, and joins the Indus at Mithankot after a course of 900 m. SUTRAS, name given to a collection of aphorisms. summaries of the teachings of the Brahmans, and of rules regulative of ritual or religious observances, and also given to these aphorisms and rules them-

SUTTEE, a Hindu widow who immolates herself on the funeral pile of her husband, a term applied to the practice itself. The practice was of very ancient date, but the custom was proclaimed illegal ancient date, but the custom was proclaimed megatin 1829 under Lord William Bentinck's administration. In 1823, in Bengal alone, 570 widows gave themselves to be so burned, of whom 109 were above sixty, 226 above forty, 209 above twenty, and 32 under twenty.

SUTTON AND CHEAM, a municipal borough in Surrey, 11 m. S. of London, of which it s virtually a suburb. Sutton is mentioned in the Domesday Book, and grew in importance on account of its

bolog, and grew in importance on account of its being on the main Brighton road.

SUWARROW, or SUVOROFF, Alexander Vasilievitch, Russian field-marshal, born in Moscow; entered the army as a private soldier, distinguished himself in the Seven Years' War, and after 20 years' service rose to command; in command of a division he in 1773 routed an army of the Turks beyond the Danube, and in 1783 he reduced a tribe of Tartars under the Russian yoke; his greatest exploit perhaps was his storming of Ismail, which had resisted all attempts to reduce it for seven months, and which he, but with revolting barbarities, took in three days, mainly by an indiscriminate massacre of 40,000 of the inhabitants; he after this conducted a cruel campaign in Poland, which ended in its partition, and a campaign in Italy to the disaster of the French and his elevation to the peerage as a prince, with the title of Italinski; he was all along the agent of the ruthless Potemkin ne was an atong one agent or the control of the (q.v.) (1729-1800).

SWANSEA, a flourishing and progressive seaport of Glamorganshire, at the entrance of the Tawe into Swansea Bay; has a splendid harbour with docks, a castle, old grammar-school, &c.; is the chief seat of tin-plate manufacture in England, and exports this product as well as coal, zinc, and other minerals, &c. SWASTIKA. See FYLFOT.

SWATOW, a seaport of China, at the mouth of the Han, 225 m. E. of Canton; has large sugar-refineries, factories for bean-cake and grass-cloth; it is a railway terminus.

SWAZILAND, a British Protectorate of 6705 sq. m., lies between the Lubombo and Drakensberg Mountains in South Africa. It is bordered on the S., W. and N., by the Transvaal, and on the E. by Natal and Portuguese East Africa. Cattle-rearing and agriculture are important, and there is considerable mineral wealth—tin, gold, copper, coal, asbestos, and iron; the Swazis are of Zulu stock; the state is one of the least developed of the British territories in Africa.

SWEATING SICKNESS, an epidemic of extraordinary malignity which swept over Europe, and especially England, in the 15th and 16th centuries, attacking with equal virulence all classes and all ages, and carrying off enormous numbers of people; was characterised by a sharp sudden seizure, high fever, followed by a fætid perspiration; first appeared, in England in 1485, and for the last time in 1551.

SWEATING SYSTEM, a term which began to be used about 1848 to describe an iniquitous system of sub-contracting in the tailoring trade. Orders from master-tailors were undertaken by subcontractors, who themselves farmed the work out to needy workers, who made the articles in their own crowded and feetid homes, receiving "starva-tion wages." The term is now used in reference to all trades in cases where the conditions imposed by masters tend to grind the rate of payment down to a bare living wage and to subject the workers to insanitary surroundings by overcrowding, &c., and insanitary state of the to unduly long hours. Kingsley's pamphlet, "Cheap Clothes and Nasty," and novel, "Alton Locke," did much to draw public attention to the Locke, did much to draw public attention we use evil. In 1890 an elaborate report by a committee of the House of Lords was published, and led in the following year to the passing of the Factory and Workshops Act and the Public Health Act, which, with subsequent Acts, have greatly mitigated the evil.

SWEDEN, a kingdom of Northern Europe, occupying the eastern portion of the great Scandinavian Peninsula, bounded W. by Norway, E. by Finland, Gulf of Bothnia, and the Baltic, and on the N. stretches across the Arctic Circle between Norway (NW.) and Finland (NE.), while its southern serrated shores are washed by the Skagerrak, Cattegat, and Baltic. From the mountain-barrier of Norway the country slopes down in broad terrace-like plains to the sea, intersected by many useful rivers and diversified by numerous lakes, of which Lakes Wenner, Wetter, and Mälar (properly an arm of the sea) are the largest, and lying under forest to the extent of nearly one-half its area; is divided into three great divisions: (1) Norrland in the N., a wide and wild tract of mountainous country, thickly forested, infested by the wolf, bear, and lynx, in summer the home of the woodcutter, and sparsely inhabited by Lapps. (2) Svealand or Sweden proper occupies the centre, and is the region of the great lakes and of the principal mineral wealth (fron, copper, &c.) of the country. (3) Gothland, the southern portion, embraces the fertile plains sloping to the Cattegat, and is the chief agricultural district, besides possessing iron and coal. Climate is fairly dry, with a warm summer and long, cold winter. Agriculture (potatoes, grain, rye, beet) is the principal industry, and with dairy-farming, stock-raising, &c., gives employment to more than one-half of the people; mining and timber-felling are only less important; chief industries include ironworks, sugar-refineries, cotton-mills, &c.; principal exports timber, iron, steel, and butter. Transit is greatly facilitated by the numerous canals and by the rivers and lakes. Railways and telegraphs are well developed in proportion to the population. As in Norway, the national religion is Lutheranism; education is free and compulsory. Government is vested in the king, who with the advice of a council controls the executive, and two legislative chambers which have equal powers, but the members of the Upper (150) are elected for eight years by the provinces and municipalities, while those of the Lower (230) are elected by universal suffrage and proportional representation and sit only for four years; members of both chambers receive salaries. In the 14th century the country became an appanage of the Danish crown, and continued as such until freedom was again won in the 16th century by the patriot king, Gustavus Vasa. By the 17th century had extended her rule across the seas into certain portions of the empire, but selling these in the beginning of the 18th century, fell from her rank as a first-rate power. In 1814 Norway was annexed, the two countries each enjoying complete autonomy, but the union was dissolved in 1905. and Norway became independent.

SWEDENBORG, Emmanuel, mystic and philo-sopher, founder of the "New Church," born in Stockholm, son of a bishop, a boy of extraordinary gifts and natural seriousness of mind; carefully educated under his father, attended the university of Upsala and took his degree in philosophy in 1709; in eager quest of knowledge visited England, Holland, France, and Germany; on his return, after four years, was at 28 appointed by Charles XII. assessor of the Royal College of Mines; in 1721 went to examine the mines and smelting-works of Europe; from 1716 spent 30 years in the composition and publication of scientific works, when of a sudden he threw himself into theology; in 1743 his period of illumination began, followed by the publication of many theological treatises; the Swedish clergy interfered a little with the publication of his works, but he kept the friendship of people in power. He was never married, his habits were simple, he lived on bread, milk, and vegetables, and occupied a house situated in a large garden; visited England several times, but attracted no attention; died in London of apoplexy in his eighty-fifth year. He is described, in London, as "a man of quiet, clerical habit, not averse to tea. and coffee, and kind to children. He wore a sword when in full velvet dress, and whenever he walked out carried a gold-headed cane." This is Emerson's account in brief of his outer man, but for a glimpse or two of his ways of thinking and his views the reader is referred to Emerson's "Representative Men" (1688-1772).

SWEDENBORGIANS, the members of the "New Jerusalem Church," founded on the teaching of Emmanuel Swedenborg (q.v.) on a belief in direct communion with the world of spirits, and in God as properly incarnate in the divine humanity of Christ.

SWERGA, or SVARGA, the summit of Mount Meru, the Hindu Olympus, the heaven or abode of Indra (q.v.) and of the gods in general.

SWETCHINE, Madame, a Russian lady, Anne Sophie Soymanof, born in Moscow, who married General Swetchine, and, after turning Catholic, became celebrated in Paris during 1817-51 as the gracious hostess of a salon where much religious and ethical discussion went on; plain and unimposing in appearance, she yet exercised a remarkable fascination over her "coterie" by the elevation of her character and eager spiritual nature (1782— 1857).

SWEYN, King of Denmark and father of Canute the Great. By nature a fighter, he conquered parts of Norway and Sweden, and his raids on the British coast were so successful that Ethelred the Unready paid him tribute. He died in 1014 at Gains-borough, Lines., after conquering much of England. SWIFT, Jonathan, born in Dublin, a posthumous son, of well-connected parents; educated at Kilkenny, where he had Congreve for companion, and at Trinity College, Dublin, where he was a some-what riotous and a by no means studious undergraduate, only receiving his B.A. by "special grace" in 1686; two years later the Revolution drove him to England; became amanuensis to his mother's distinguished relative Sir William Temple. whose service, however, was uncongenial to his proud independent nature, and after taking a Master's degree at Oxford he returned to Dublin, took orders, and was presented to the canonry of Kilroot, near Belfast; the quiet of country life palling upon him, he was glad to resume secretarial service in Temple's household (1896), where during the next three years he remained, mastering the craft of politics, reading enormously, and falling in love with Stella (q.v.); was set adrift by Temple's death in 1699, but shortly afterwards became secretary to Lord Berkeley, one of the Lord-Deputies to Ireland, and was soon settled in the vicarage of Laracor, West Meath; in 1704 appeared anonymously his famous satires, the "Battle of the Books" and the "Tale of a Tub," masterpieces of English prose; various squibs and pamphlets followed, "On the Inconvenience of Abolishing Christianity," &c.; but politics more and more engaged his attention; being neglected by the Whigs and hating their war policy, he turned Tory, attacked with deadly effect, during his editorship Kilroot, near Belfast; the quiet of country life wings and nating their war policy, he turned tory, attacked with deadly effect, during his editorship of the Examiner (1710-1711), the war party and its leader Marlborough, crushed Steele's defence in his "Tublic Spirit of the Whigs," and after the publication of "The Conduct of the Allies" stood easily the foremost political writer of his time; disappointed of an English bishopric, in 1713 reluctantly accepted the deanery of St. Patrick's, Dublin, a position he held until the close of his life; hearned a position he held until the close of his life; became a position he country he despised by eloquently voicing the wrongs of Ireland in a series of tracts, "Drapier's Letters," &c., fruitful of good results; crowned his great reputation by the publication (1728) of his masterpiece "Gulliver's Travels," the most daring, savage, and amusing satire contained in the world's literature; Stella's death and the slow progress of a brain disease, ending in insanity, cast an ever-deepening gloom over his later years

(1667-1745). SWILLY, Lough, a narrow inlet of the Atlantic, on the coast of Donegal, Republic of Ireland, running in between Dunaff Head (E.) and Fanad Point (W.), a distance of 25 m.; is from 3 to 4 m. broad.

SWINBURNE, Algernon Charles, poet and prose writer, born in London, son of Admiral Swinburne; educated at Balliol College, Oxford, went to Florence and spent some time there; his first pro-Guetions were plays, two of them tragedies, and "Poems and Ballads," his later "A Song of Italy," essay on "William Blake," and "Songs before Sunrise," instinct with pantheistic and republican ideas, besides "Studies in Song," "Studies in Prose and Poetry, "&c.; he ranks as the successor of Landor, of whom he was a great admirer, stood high both as a note and a critic and was a great admirer, stood high both as a note and a critic and was a great admirer. high both as a poet and a critic, and was a man of broad and generous sympathies (1837-1909). SWINDON, a town in Wiltshire, 77 m. W. of London; famous for its railway engineering works, which employ a large proportion of the population; it has other types of engineering works, and agriculture is carried on.

SWINEMUNDE, a seaport and watering-place under Polish administration, on the island of Usedom, in the Baltic, near the mouth of the Swine, one of the outlets of the Oder. It acts as an outer Baltic port for Stettin.

SWISS CONFEDERATION, The, took its origin in the formation of an offensive and defensive alliance against Albert, Duke of Austria, by the Swiss cantons of Uri, Schwyz, and Zürich, in 1291; extended at various times during national emergencies, its independence was recognised by the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648. SWISS GUARDS. See GARDES SUISSES.

SWITHIN, St., bishop of Winchester from 852 to 862; was buried by his own request in Winchester Churchyard "where passers-by might tread above his head, and the dews of heaven fall on his grave. On his canonisation, a century after, the chapter resolved to remove his body to a shrine in the cathedral, but their purpose was hindered on account of a rain which lasted 40 days from July 15; hence the popular notion that if it rained that day it would be followed by rain for 40 days after.

SWITZERLAND, a republic of Central Europe, WILZERLAND, a republic of Central Europe, formed by a confederation of 22 cantons (3 of which are subdivided, making 25 in all), and bounded by Germany (N.), France (W.), Italy (S.), and Austria and Italy (E.); in size it is slightly more than one-half of Scotland, of semicircular shape, having the Jura Alps on its French border, and divided from Italy by the great central ranges of the Alpine system whence radiate the Swiss of the Alpine system, whence radiate the Swiss Alps—Pennine, Lepontine, Bernese, &c.—covering the E. and S., and occupying with intervening valleys two-thirds of the country; the remaining third is occupied by an elevated fertile plain, extending between Lakes of Constance and Geneva (largest of numerous lakes), and studded with picturesque hills; principal rivers are the Upper Rhône, the Aar, Ticino, and Inn; climate varies with the elevation, from the high regions of perpetual snow to warm valleys where ripen the vine, fig, almond, and olive; about one-third of the land surface is under forest, and one-quarter arable, the grain grown forming only one-half of what is required; flourishing dairy farms exist, prospered by the fine meadows and mountain pastures which, with the forests, comprise the country's greatest wealth; minerals are scarce, iron and manganese are mined but coal is absent. Despite its restricted arable area and lack of minerals the country has attained a high pitch of prosperity through the thrift and energy of its people, who have skilfully utilised the motive-power of innumerable waterfalls and mountain streams to drive great factories of silks, cottons, watches, and jewellery. The beauty of its mountain, lake, and river scenery has long made Switzerland the sanatorium and recreation ground of Europe; more than 500 health resorts exist, and the country has been described as one vast hotel. The Alpine barriers are crossed by splendid roads and railways, the great tunnels through St. Gothard and the Simplon being triumphs of engineering skill and enterprise. In 1848, after the suppression of the Sonderbund (q.v.), the existing league of 22 semi-independent States (constituting since 1798 the Helvetic Republic) formed a closer federal union, and a constitution (amended in 1874) was drawn up conserving as far as possible the distinctive laws of the cantons and local institutions of their communes. The President is elected annually by the Federal Assembly (which consists of two chambers con-stituting the legislative power), and is assisted in the executive government by a Federal Council of seven members. By an institution known as the "Referendum" all legislative acts passed in the Cantonal or Federal Assemblies may under certain conditions be referred to the mass of the electors, and this is frequently done. There is a national amy and air force; the estimated population is 4,850,000, the majority inhabiting the Swiss Foreland; they comprise four linguistic groups—German speaking, French speaking, Italian speaking and Romansh speaking. Education is free and compulsory; there are seven universities and many fine technical schools.

SYBARIS, an ancient city of Magna Græcia, on the Gulf of Tarentum, flourished in the 17th century B.C., but in 510 B.C. was captured and totally obliterated by the rival colonists of Crotona; at the height of its prosperity the luxury and volup-tuousness of the inhabitants was such as to become a byword throughout the ancient world, and hencea by word throughout the ancient word, and nenter-forth a Sybaris city is a city of luxurious indul-gence, and Sybarite a devotee of pleasure. SYBEL, Heinrich von, German historian, born in Düsseldorf; was a pupil of Ranke, and became professor of History at Munich and Bonn; he was a Liberal in politics; his great works are a "History of the Period of the French Revolution from 1789 to 1795, and then to 1800," in five volumes, and the "History of the Founding of the German Empire under William I.," in five volumes; he also wrote a. History of the First Crusade "(1817-1895).

London, to the SE of which it lies at a distance of 7 m., where in 1852-4 the Crystal Palace (q.v.) was erected and stood till its destruction by fire in 1936, a far-famed sight of London, containing valuable collections illustrative of the arts and sciences, and surrounded by a park and gardens.

SYDENHAM, 1st Baron (Charles Edward Poulett Thomson), British politician. Born in London, he spent several years in business, before becoming M.P. for Dover in 1826; in 1834 he became President of the Board of Trade, and in 1839 Governor-General of Canada, where he took an active part in centralising government and unifying the country; raised to the peerage in 1840, he died the following year as the result of a riding accident (1799-1841).

SYDENHAM, Floyer, Greek scholar; translated some of the Dialogues of Plato into English, and wrote a dissertation on Heraclitus, which failed of being appreciated, and involved in embarrassment he was thrown into prison because he could not pay a small bill for provisions, and there died; his sad fate led to the foundation of the Literary Fund (1710-1787).

Thomas, the "English Hippo-SYDENHAM. crates, 'born in Dorsetshire, educated at Oxford, and a Fellow of All Souls'; practised medicine in London, where, though regarded with disavour by the faculty, he stood in high regard, and had an extensive practice, from his study of the symptoms of disease, and the respect he paid to the constitution of the patient; he used his own sense and judgment in each case, and his treatment was uniformly successful; he commanded the regard of his contemporaries Locke and Boyle, and ranks as a great reformer in the healing art (1624-1639).

SYDNEY, Algernon. See SIDNEY.
SYDNEY, the capital of New South Wales, the oldest and largest city in Australia, and the fourth largest city of the Commonwealth, is situated on one of the most beautiful harbours (Port Jackson) in the world. The harbour bridge is one of the largest engineering schemes of its kind ever undertaken. and links up the north and south shores. The city contains many very fine buildings, including the university, art gallery, museums, two cathedrals, libraries, and hospitals. Its manufactures are numerous and its commercial interests very large. It is a very important railway centre, and the extensive and modern plant for dealing with ship-ping and storing and loading grain in bulk is second to none in the southern hemisphere; it has steam and electric train connection with the suburbs, and there is a city underground electric railway. SYLLOGISM, an argument consisting of three propositions, of which two are called premises, major and minor, and the one that necessarily follows from them the conclusion.

SYLPHS, elemental spirits of the air, as salamanders are of fire, of light figure with gliding movements and procreative power.

SYLT, one of the N. Frisian Islands of Germany; it is situated off the west coast of Schleswig, and is 22 m. in length and under half a mile wide in most places; the chief village is Westerland, in the middle of the island, while there are good harbours at both ends; it is a popular holiday resort.

SYLVESTER, James Joseph, British mathematician. Born in London, he was educated at Liverpool and Cambridge, where he was second wrangler in 1837; he lectured most of his life, being wranger in 15% he recture most of ins life, being successively professor at University College, London, Virginia University, U.S.A., the Woolwich Royal Military Academy, Baltimore University, and finally Oxford, where he was appointed Savillian professor of geometry (1814–1897).

SYLVESTER, St., the name of three Popes; S. I., Pope from 314 to 335; S. II., Pope from 999 to 1003, was famous under his own name, Gerbert, as an educator and as successively bishop of Rheims and Ravenna; and S. III., anti-Pope from 1041 to 1046.

SYLVESTER, St., the first Pope of the name; there is no truth in the legend that he converted Constantine and his mother, though as he is fabled to have done so by restoring a dead ox to life, he is usually represented with an ox lying beside him, and sometimes as baptising Constantine.

SYMBIOSIS, name given to the relation between two different organisms which live together to their mutual benefit.

Of colours, black typifies grief and death; blue, hope, love of divine works, divine contemplation, piety, sincerity; pale blue, power, Christian prudence, love of good works, serene conscience; gold, glory and power; green, faith, immortality, resurrection, gladness; pale green, baptism; grey, tribulation; purple, justice, royalty; red, martyrdom for faith, charity, divine love, and in later days, Communism; saffron, confession; scarlet, fervour and glory; sauron, contession; scariet, fervour and glory; silver, chastity and purity; violet, penitence; white, purity, temperance, innocence, chastity, and faith in God. Instances of form: Anchor typifies hope; palm, victory; sword, death or martyrdom; the lamb, Christ; unicorn, purity. Of stones, moreover, the amethyst typifies humility; diamond, invulnerable faith; sardonyx sincerity; sapphire, hope, &c.

SYME, James, a great surgeon, born in Edinburgh; was demonstrator under Liston; was elected to the chair of Clinical Surgery in 1833; gave up the chair to succeed Liston in London in 1848, but returned a few months after; was re-elected to the chair he had vacated; he was much honoured by chair he had vacaced; he was much honoured by his pupils, and by none more than Dr. John Brown, who characterised him as "the best, ablest, and most beneficent of men"; he wrote treatises and papers on surgery (1799-1870).

SYMINGTON, William, British inventor, devised an early form of steam engine for ships and for road lecomotion (1782-1821)

locomotion (1763-1831)

SYMONDS, John Addington, English man of letters, born in Bristol; educated at Harrow and Oxford; author of "The Renaissance in Italy," a work which shows an extensive knowledge of the subject, and is written in a finished but rather flowery style, and a number of other works of a kindred nature showing equal ability and literary skill: his translation of Benvenuto Cellini's autobiography is particularly noteworthy; was consumptive, and spent his later years at Davos, in the Engadine (1840-1893).

SYMPHLAGADES, two fabulous floating rocks at the entrance of the Euxine, which, when driven by the winds, crushed every vessel that attempted to pass between them; the ship Argo (q.v.) managed to pass between them, but with the loss of part of her stern after which they became fixed.

SYMPHONY, an elaborate orchestral composition consisting usually of four contrasted and related movements; began to take distinctive shape in the 17th century, and was for long merely a form of overture to operas, &c., but as its possibilities were perceived was elevated into an independent concert piece, and as such exercised the genius of Mozart and Haydn, reaching its perfection in the symphonies of Beethoven, other leading exponents of the form being Mendelssohn, Schubert, Brahms, and Tschaikovsky.

SYNAGOGUE, a Jewish institution for worship and religious instruction which dates from the period of rengious instruction which dates from the period of the Babylonian Captivity, especially to keep alive in the minds of the people a knowledge of the law. The decree ordaining it required the families of a district to meet twice every Sabbath for this purpose, and so religiously did the Jewish people observe it that it continues a characteristic ordinance of Judaism to this day. The study of the law became henceforth their one vocation, and the synagogue was instituted both to instruct them in it and to remind them of the purpose of their separate existence among the nations of the earth. High as the Temple and its service still stood in the esteem of every Jew, from the period of the Cap-tivity it began to be felt of secondary importance to the synagogue and its service. With the erection and extension of the latter the people were being slowly trained into a truer sense of the nature of religious worship, and gradually made to feel that to know the will of God and do it was a more genuine act of homage to Him than the offering of sacrifices upon an altar or the observance of any religious rite. Under such training the issue be-tween the Jew and the Samaritan became of less and less consequence, and he and not the Samaritan was on the pathway which led direct to the final worship of God in spirit and in truth (John iv.

SYNAGOGUE, The Great, the name given to a council at Jerusalem, consisting of 120 members, there assembled about the year 410 B.O. to give final form to the service and worship of the Jewish Church. A Jewish tradition says Moses received The law from Sinai; he transmitted it to Joshua, Joshua to the elders, the elders to the prophets, to the men of the Great Assembly, who added thereto these words: "Be circumspect in judgment, make many disciples, and set a hedge about the law To them belong the final settlement and arrangement of the Jewish Scriptures, the introduction of a new alphabet, the regulation of the synagogue worship, and the adoption of sundry liturgical forms, as well as the establishment of the Feast of Purim (q.v.), and probably the "schools" of the Scribes. SYNCOPATION, a musical term denoting a temporary break in the regularly recurring accent by prolonging a sound from a weak place in the bar to a stronger one, or by beginning a note after the start of a beat and continuing it into the next beat. The practice became popular in America, and was introduced into England about the time of the first world war, when it became the basis of jazz (q.v.), and particularly popular among dancers, crooners, SYNCRETISM, the reconciliation of conflicting beliefs, &c., especially the attempted blending by George Calixtus (q.v.) of the Catholic and Lutheran faiths in the 17th century.

cereals, wine, &c.
TELL, William, a legendary Swiss hero, said to have been a peasant of the canton of Uri in the early 14th century; the quite unauthenticated story has it that he resisted the oppression of the Austrian governor Gessler, and was taken prisoner, but was promised his liberty if with his bow and arrow he could hit an apple on the head of his son, a feat he accomplished with one arrow, with a second arrow in his belt, which he told Gessler he had kept to shoot him with if he had failed. This so incensed the governor that he bound him to carry him off to his castle, but as they crossed the lake a storm arose, and Tell had to be unbound to save them, when he leapt upon a rock and made off, to lie in ambush, whence he shot the oppressor through the heart as he passed him; a rising followed, which ended only with the emancipation of Switzerland from the yoke of Austria. into a spacious plain.
TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES were started early in the 19th century. In England the British and Foreign Temperance Society was founded in 1831, and the London Temperance League in 1851; although they have not been successful in securing all the reforms they have long agitated for, they can claim that to some extent the great reduction in drunkenness in England is partly owing to their work, even though a large part is undoubtedly due to heavy taxation and to the increase of out-ofdoor activities. In the U.S.A., where temperance propaganda was so successful that it brought propagation was so soccessing that it brought about, in 1919, the abortive attempt at complete prohibition (q.x), the first Temperance Society was founded in 1808.

TEMPLARS, a famous order of knights which flourished during the Middle Ages, and originated in connection with the Crusades. Its founders were Hugues de Payen and Geoffroi de St. Omer, who, along with 17 other French knights, in 1119 formed themselves into a brotherhood, taking vows of chastity and poverty, for the purpose of convoying, in safety from attacks of Saracens and infidels, pilgrims to the Holy Land. King Baldwin II. of Jerusalem granted them a residence in a portion of his palace, built on the site of the Temple of Solomon, and close to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which became the especial object of their protection. Hence their assumption of the name "Templars." The order rapidly increased in numbers, and drew members from all classes. "The Templar was the embodiment of the two strongest passions of the Middle Ages— the desire for military renown and for a monk's life." A constitution was drawn up by Bernard of Clairvaux (1128), and later three ranks were recognised—the knights, who alone wore the mantle of white linen and red cross, men-at-arms, and lower retainers, while a grand-master, seneschal, and other officers were created. During the first 150 years of their existence the Templars increased enormously in power; under papal authority they enjoyed many privileges, such as exemption from taxes, tithes, and interdict. After the capture of Jerusalem by the infidels Cyprus became in 1291 their headquarters, and subsequently France. But their usefulness was at an end, and their arrogance, luxury, and quarrels with the Hospitallers had alienated the sympathies of Christendom. Measures of the cruellest and most barbarous kind were taken for their suppression by Philip the Fair of France, supported by Pope Clement IV. Between 1306 and 1314 hundreds were burned at the stake, the order scattered, and their possessions confiscated.

TEMPLE BAR, a famous London gateway, which formerly divided Fleet Street from the Strand; pressure of traffic caused its removal in 1879; now stands in Theobald's Park, Cheshunt.

TEMPLE, The, of Jerusalem, a building constructed on the same plan and for the same purpose as the Tabernacle (q.r.), only of larger dimensions, more substantial and costly materials, and a more ornate style; it was a magnificent structure, contained treasures of wealth, and was the pride of the Hebrew people. There were three successive structures that bore the name-Solomon's, built by Solomon about 970 B.C., and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 B.C.; Zerubbabel's, built in 516, and pillaged and desecrated by Antiochus Epiphanes in 167 B.C.; and Herod's, on the ruins of the former, begun in 16 B.C., finished in 29 A.D., and destroyed by Titus in 70 A.D. All three were built on Mount Moriah, on the spot where Abraham offered up Isaac, and where David afterwards raised an altar to the Lord; and of the number the palm must be given to the Temple of Solomon, it was the Temple par excellence.

Punch in 1851; was knighted in 1893 (1820-1914). TENNIS originated in France and Italy in the Middle Ages, being derived from handball; racquets did not come into use till the 14th century. The game had reached England by the time Chaucer wrote, and continued afterwards as a game for the nobility, Henry VIII. being a player. This "real" tennis continues to be played by a few, but the expense of maintaining courts led to the growth of Lawn Tennis, a popular variant of the original game started by Major Wingfield in 1874. In 1875 the M.C.C. issued a code of laws for the new game, a court was opened at Wimbledon, and in 1877 the first championship was held there. The Lawn Tennis Association was formed in 1888, and in 1900 the Davis Cup competition was instituted for international male matches, and soon attracted entries from Britain, America, Canada, Australia, South Africa, India, Japan, and nearly every Continental country. Besides these matches the principal tennis fixtures are the annual championships at Wimbledon, St. Cloud, and Forest Hills (U.S.A.), and the Anglo-American women's contests for the Wightman Cup.

The radical idea of the system appears to be reincarnation, and the return of the spirit to itself by a succession of incarnations, each one of which raises it to a higher level, until, by seven stages it would seem, the process is complete, matter has become spirit, and spirit matter, God has become man, and man God. Adherents of this system, with their headquarters at Madras, are numerous and wide-scattered, and form an organisation of many branches, having three definite aims: (1) To establish a brotherhood over the world irrespective of race, creed, casts, or sex;
(2) to encourage the study of comparative philosophy, religion, and science; and (3) to investigate the occult secrets of nature and the latent possibilicare occurs secrets of nature and the fatert possibilities of man. The principal books in exposition of it are, "The Secret Doctrine," "Isis Unveiled," "The Key to Theosophy," by Mme. Blavatsky; "Esoteric Buddhism," "The Occult World," &c., by Sinnett; "The Ancient Wisdom," "The Birth and Evolution of the Soul," &c., by Annie Besant. THERA. See SANTORIN.

THIRTY YEARS' WAR, the name given to a series of wars arising out of one another in Germany during 1618-48; was first a war of Catholics against Protestants, but in its later stages developed into a struggle for supremacy in Europe. On the Catholic side were Austria, various German Catholic princes, and Spain, to whom were opposed successively Bohemia, Hungary, Denmark, Sweden, and France; originated in Bohemia, where the Protestants were goaded to revolt against the intolerance of the empire: Moravians and Hungarians came to their assistance, but the imperial forces were too powerful and the rising was suppressed, only to be powerful and the timing was supplied as the Protestant cause, but struggled vainly against Catholic armies under Wallenstein and Tilly. The tactless oppression of the Emperor Ferdinand again fanned into flame the fires of rebellion; Swedish armies now came to the assistance of the Protestants, and under Gustavus Adolphus waged successful war against the emperor, but the death of Gustavus at Lützen (1632) turned the tide in favour of the imperial forces; the German Protestant princes made a disadvantageous peace in 1635, but Sweden, now joined by France, continued the struggle against the Austrian empire. Turenne and Condé became the heroes of the war, and by a series of decisive victories rolled back the imperial armies, and by 1648 were converging upon Austria, when diplomacy ended the war by the Peace of Westphalia, the chief gains being the securing of religious tolerance and the recognition of Switzerland and the Netherlands as independent republics. TRADE UNIONS negotiate wages and working conditions for their members. The early unions were formed during the industrial revolution of the 18th century and today there are nearly 10 million trade unionists in this country. Before 1824 trade unions were illegal bodies but successive legislative measures from 1871 onwards have helped to give more definition to their legal position. In 1868 the Trades Union Congress was set up and this national trade union centre today has affiliated to it 183 unions with more than eight million members the vast proportion of trade unionists in Britain. The T.U.C. is recognised by Government, national employers' bodies, and international organisations as the representative spokesman of organised labour in Britain and there is extensive machinery for regular consultation between the T.U.C. and Government departments and other national organisations dealing in particular with social and organisations examing in particular wave seconomic problems. Trade unions may either negotiate wages and working conditions as individual organisations or they may join together where they share organisation of workers in a particular industry or group of industries. UNEMPLOYMENT in serious volume has existed since the industrial revolution at the end of the 18th century, and in normal times occurs in cycles, boom in trade following depression at fairly regular intervals. The trade unions were the first to tackle the problem of maintaining the unemployed durthe problem of manushing one themplays are ing had spells as far as their members were concerned, and in 1912 compulsory State insurance against unemployment came into force, workers, employers, and State defraying the cost. After the employers, and State defraying the cost. After the first world war the volume of unemployment in Great Britain rose to over a million, and in 1932, the "peak" year, to over 2,920,000 or nearly 23 per cent. of the insured population. The question of getting these men and women back to work became a political issue of the first order, successive governments trying remedies, at first with scant success but later with better results, the percentage in 1935 being down to 9.5. In the late 1930's, the re-armament programme, and the consequent call for additional labour, caused the unemployment figures to drop rapidly.

UNION, The, a name applied in the English history to (1) the Union of England and Scotland in 1603 under one crown, by the accession of James VI. of Scotland to the throne of England on the death of Elizabeth; (2) the Union of England and Scotland in 1707, under one Parliament seated at Westminster, into the United Kingdom of Great Britain; and (3) to the Union of the United Kingdom of Great Britain to Ireland in 1801, when the Irish Parliament was abolished, and was represented in Royal Proclamation, Dec. 6, 1922, following the passing of the Act setting up the Irish Free State.

UNION JACK, originally the flag of Great Britain, on which the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew are blended, with which certain white streaks were blended or ambriated after the Union with Ireland; technically the name should be Union Flag, the Union Jack strictly being the small Union Flag which is flown from the jackstaff of a ship. UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS occupies roughly the territory of the former Russian Empire except for Poland and Finland. It consists of sixteen independent Republics— the Russian Soviet Federal Socialist Republic; the Russian Soviet Federal Socialist Republic; the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; the Byelorussian S.S.R.; the Azerbaijan S.S.R.; the Georgian S.S.R.; the Karelo-Finnish S.S.R.; the Moldavian S.S.R.; the Estonian S.S.R.; the Lithuanian S.S.R.; Kazakh S.R. (Kazakhstan); Turkmen S.S.R. (Turkmenistan); Uzbek S.S.R. (Uzbekistan); Tadjik S.S.R. (Tadjikistan); and the Kirghiz S.S.R. (Tadjikistan); and the Kirghiz S.S.R. (Kirghizia), which together form the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The Union embraces one-sixth of the land surface of the globe including nearly one-half of Europe and all northern and part of central Asia. On the north it fronts the Arctic Ocean. Its southern limit forms an irregular line from the north-west corner of the Black Sea to the Sea of Japan, skirting Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan, Sin-Kiang, Mongolia, and Manchuria; the Behring Sea, Sea of Okhotsk, and Sea of Japan wash its eastern shores; Finland, the Baltic Sea, Poland, Czechoslovakla, and Rumania He contiguous to it in west Europe; its greatest west/east length is about 5700 m. and north/south 2800 m.; its frontiers extend for about 43,000 m., of which about 29,000 is coastline. The area of the U.S.S.R. is over 8,708,000 sq. m., with population in 1955 of over 200,000,000, speaking about 150 languages and dialects, including Finns, Kurds, Persians, Turco-Tartars, Uzbeks, Yakuts, Kara-Kalpaks, Tunguses, Mongols, etc. The principal language is Russian, and Ukrainian, which is akin to Russian, comes next.

Approximately 82 per cent. of the land surface with about one-third of the population lies in Asia. Russia in Europe is divided from Asia by the Ural Mountains and river and Caspian Sea; forms an irregular somewhat elongated square plain sloping down to the frontiers of the Baltic Sea and Poland (W.), White Sea (N.), and Black Sea (S.); is seamed by river valleys and diversified by marshes, vast lakes (e.g. Ladoga, Onega, Peipus, and Ilmen), enormous forests and in the north and centre by tablelands, the highest of which are the Valdai Hills (1100 feet); the S.E. plain is called the Steppes. The cold and warm winds which sweep uninterrupted from N. to S. produce extremes of temperature; the rainfall is small. The rich plains known as the "black lands" which stretch from the Carpathians to the Urals are the most productive corn lands in Europe; timber is important in the NW. and forms a large item in the export trade. Maize, tobacco, rubber, and the vine are cultivated in the extreme south. Before the Revolution agriculture was the predominant industry, but now little over 20 per cent. of the total production is agricultural. Cotton plantations are being extended in the Central Asian Republics of the U.S.S.R., in Azerbaijan, etc., tea is cultivated in Georgia, the sugar beet in the Ukraine and other areas. Agriculture and particularly horticulture is extending farther and farther north. Frost resisting varieties of vines are being cultivated in 40 regions of the central and northern belts of the U.S.S.R.

Between 1926 and 1953 some 800 new towns have been built, some right from the foundations in newly industrialised areas or near the sites of new hydro-electric stations, others on the sites or as the extensions of former villages. New towns have been built mainly in the Volga Steppes, the Urals, been built mainly in the Voiga Steppes, and Olam, Western Siberia, and Central Asia—they include Rerezniki. Krasnouralsk, Igarka, Magnitogorsk, Berezniki, Krasnouralsk, Igarka, Kirovsk, Karaganda, Komsomolsk, Kemerevo, Novaya-Kakhovka, Takhia-Tash, and many more. Minerals abound and include gold (Russia now being the second gold producing country in the world), iron (widely distributed), copper (chiefly in middle Urals), platinum; there are several large coalfields and some of the richest oil fields in the Industry in the U.S.S.R. and indeed all of her national economy is state controlled. The fisheries, particularly those of the Caspian, are the most productive in Europe; horses and cattle are reared on the Steppes. Wolves, bears, and valuable fur bearing animals are plentiful in the north and the state the science is the Caspian of the Steppes. other parts; the reindeer is still found, also the elk.

In the past, commerce has been hampered by the scarcity of ice free ports but modern methods are largely overcoming this difficulty and timber, flax, wool, and other animal products, fur and leather, wool, and other animal products, int and teather, minerals oil, chemicals, and electrical materials are largely exported. Moreover, since 1940 when the Baltic States joined the Soviet Union it has had the ice free Baltic ports of Ventspils, Liepaja, Klaipeda, also the ports of Tallin and Riga ice bound for much shorter periods than Leningrad. The U.S.S.R. also has the practically ice free ports of Murmansk and Pechenga on the NW. There is a vast inland trade facilitated by the great rivers with their interconnecting canals (Volga, Don, Dnieper, Dniester, Vistula, etc.) and by extensive railways and telegraphic communica-

Before the Revolution the bulk of the Russians proper belonged to the Greek Church, but included in the Empire were and still are, members of all religions—Jews, Islam, Buddhism, Shamanism, Animism, as well as countless secis of Christians; but the orthodox (Greek) church was the only officially recognised church and was closely bound up with the state; other religions often suffered much persecution and even suppression; today though there is no state religion and though all religions are separated from the state and education, both freedom of worship and anti-religious propa-ganda are permitted to all.

Education is obligatory and, on the technical side, very intensive. By the end of 1955, most large towns provided education for all children from 8 to 17 years of age and the system is being rapidly stended throughout the country. There are also special labour reserve schools for young people from 14 to 17 years of age in which a general education is combined with some specialised profession and industrial training in order to provide a Filled worker for waters because of the provide skilled workers for various branches of the national economy. There are also numerous music and art schools. Kindergarten and creches are available for young children and babies. There are about 887 colleges and technical schools (many are about 887 colleges and rectnical schools (many of university status); among the towns which now have universities are Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Kharkov, Odessa, Saratov, Sverdlovsk, Kazan, Minsk, Gorki, Vladivostock, Tomsk, Tbilisi, Tashkeni, Tartu, Alma-Ata. In 1955 there were about 2500 research institutes, and in addition to the Academy of Sciences of the U.S.S.R. 13 of the 16 constituent Republics had their own Academy of Sciences, the others had branches of the Academy of Sciences of the U.S.S.R. After the Revolution of 1917, a Council of Peoples' Commissars with Lenin as Chairman was formed for the administration of the country. formed for the administration of the country. Subsequent attempts at counter revolution as well as foreign armed intervention all failed. The Russian Federal Soviet Socialist Republic thus formed later united with the other Soviet Republics founded on the territory of the former Bussian Empire to form the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (U.S.S.R.). The constituent Republics have the right to secode from the Union if they so

WAR, The First World, the great international conflict between Germany, Austria, Turkey, and Bulgaria and the Allies (u.v.), of whom Britain, France, and Russia were the chief; for the first time in history whole nations and not merely armies were at war, some 30 million men being armies were at war, some 30 million men being under arms, and poison gas, aeroplanes, and other scientific ways of fighting were introduced; the total cost in human life was 9 million, while millions more were disabled. The war arose out of the assassination of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand, heir to the throne of Austria, by a Serb at Serajevo on June 28, 1914; stringent demands for satisfaction were made by Austria, and although Serbia agreed to eight out of ten of them and was willing to refer the other two points to the Hague Conference, Austria, with assurances of German support, broke off relations with Serbia. and formally declared war on July 28. Russia at once mobilised in support of Serbia, and Germany retaliated by declaring war on Russia, whose ally, France, was next brought into the conflict. German troops on August 1 crossed the frontiers of Luxemburg and Belgium, an action which brought Luxemburg and Beigium, an action which brought forth an ultimatum from Britain, who was a signatory to the treaty guaranteeing Beigian neutrality. On Aug. 4 Great Britain declared war on Germany, and fighting went on in Flanders, France, Italy, the Balkans, Mesopotamia, East Africa, China, and on the high seas, for four years. On the Western Front hostilities were ended by an amietic on Nav 11 1918; but neget was not armistice on Nov. 11, 1918; but peace was not formally established until the coming into force on Aug. 6, 1924, of the treaty signed at Lausanne on July 23, 1923, by Turkey and the Allies. WAR, The Second World, a further international and world-wide conflict between, on the one hand, the allies (including Britain, the United States of America, France, the U.S.S.R., and China), and, America, Érance, the U.S.S.R., and China), and, on the other hand, the Axis powers (including Germany, Italy, and Japan and their smaller supporting states). During the 1930's there were a series of acts of aggression by the Axis powers, particularly in the annexing by Germany of Austria and Czechoslovakia in 1938-9, and culminating in the invasion of Poland by Germany on Sept. 1, 1939. On Sept. 3, Britain and France declared war on Germany, and the commonwealth countries followed suit within a week. During the following nine months, Germany conquered Poland, Denmark, Norway, the many conquered Poland, Denmark, Norway, the Netherlands, Belgium, and, in June 1940, France was forced to capitulate. Britain then stood was forced to capitulate. Britain then stood alone in the war until Germany invaded Russia in 1941; then the U.S.A. declared war after the Japanese had attacked her naval base at Pearl Harbour, in Dec., 1941. Fighting took place in many areas of the globe, among the chief of which are the following: Africa and Egypt, 1940-3, Italy, 1943-5, the Russian Front, 1941-2 and 1943-5, the Western or "Second" Front, 1944-5 (which resulted in the unconditional surrender of Germany on May 7, 1945, when the British, American, and French troops reached Central Germany and the Russians entered Berlin from the east), the Far Eastern campaigns Berlin from the east), the Far Eastern campaigns against Japan, 1941-5 (which ended on Aug. 14, 1945, after two atomic bombs had been dropped on Japan, and Russia had invaded Manchuria). Intense sea warfare was waged during the above campaigns, each side being determined to blockade essential supplies of manpower, raw materials and foodstuffs, and thus prevent new resources from reaching the enemy.

WILKES, John, a notable figure in the English political world of the 18th century, born in Clerkenwell, son of a distiller; was elected M.P. for Aylesbury in 1761; started a periodical called the North Briton, in No. 45 of which he published an offensive libel, which led to his arrest and imprisonment in the Tower, from which he was released—on the ground that the general warrant on which he was apprehended was illegal-amid general rejoicing among the people; he was afterwards prosecuted for an obscene production, an "Essay on Woman," and outlawed for non-appearance; he sought an asylum in France, and on his return was elected for Widdlaces, but bested of both Middlesex, but instead of being allowed to sit was committed to prison; this treatment made him the committed to prison; this treatment and object of popular favour; he was elected Lord Mayor of London, re-elected for Middlesex, and at length allowed to take his seat in the House; he was the cause of popular tumults, the was for years the cause of popular tumults, the watchword of which was "Wilkes and Liberty" the cause of civil liberty certainly owes something to him and to the popular agitations which an interest in him stirred up (1727-1797).

WILKIE, Sir David, painter, born in Cults, Fife; executed a great many pictures depicting homely subjects, which were very popular, and are generally well known by the engravings of them, such as "The Rent Day," "The Penny Wedding," "Reading the Will," and "The Blind Fiddler," which were followed by others in a more ambitious style, and less appreciated, as well as portraits (1785 1841).

WILKINS, Sir George Hubert, Australian explorer. Born at Mount Bryan, South Australia, he became a photographer with the Turkish army in the Balkan War of 1912, and in the first world war served in the Australian Air Force, after being war served in the Australian Air Force, after being second-in-command of Stefansson's Canadian Arctic expedition of 1913; he took a leading part in the Eritish Imperial Antarctic expedition of 1920, and Shackleton's last expedition of 1921, and in 1926-8 led the Detroit Arctic expeditions, and in 1931 the Nautilus Submarine Arctic expedition; he was knighted in 1928 (1888- ).
WILKINS, John, bishop of Chester, born in Northamptonshire; married Oliver Cromwell's sister: amponismic, matrieu onver convert sister; wrote curious mathematical treatises, in particular, "Discovery of a New World," and was one of the founders of the Royal Society (1614-1672).

WILKINSON, Sir John Gardner, Egyptologist born in Westmorland; studied at Oxford; explored the antiquities of Egypt, and wrote largely on the subject (1797-1875).

WILL, a legal document making provision for the disposal of property after death; only people of full age can make a will, and it must be signed by the testator in the presence of two witnesses who must, there and then, in his and their presence, also sign it; copies of wills are kept at Somerset House. London.

WILLEMS, Jan Frans, Dutch poet and scholar, born near Antwerp; translated "Reynard the Fox" into Flemish, and did much to encourage the Flemings to preserve and cultivate their mother-tongue (1793-1846).

WILLETT, William, the promoter of the policy of daylight saving, by putting forward clocks one hour in summer; his measure was adopted in Great Britain a year after his death, in New York in 1918, and subsequently in most civilised countries; he was a builder by trade (1857–1915).

WILLIAM I., The Conqueror, king of England, born in Falaise; became Duke of Normandy by the death of his father; being an illegitimate son had to establish his power with the sword; being the cousin of Edward the Confessor was nominated by him his successor to the English throne; on this being usurped by Harold, he invaded England and defeated Harold at Senlac in 1066 and assumed the royal power, which he established over the length and breadth of the country in 108s; he rewarded his followers with grants of land and lordships over them, subject to the Crown; the Domesday Book (q.v.) was compiled by his order, and the kingdom brought into closer relation with the Church of Rome, his adviser in Church matters being Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury (2.0.); died by a fall from his horse when suppressing rebellion in Normandy, and was buried at Caen. His invasion of England is known as the Norman Conquest and it involved the introduction of the feudal system and Norman manners in the habits and speech of the English people (1027-1087).
WILLIAM II., king of England, surnamed Rufus or

Ruddy, born in Normandy, third son of William I.; succeeded his father in 1087; had to face a rebellion, headed by Bishop Odo, in favour of his eldest brother, Robert Duke of Normandy, which he suppressed by favour of the mass of the people, to whom he made promises which he did not keep, for he proved a stern and exacting ruler; his energy was great, but was frequently spasmodic; he added Normandy to his dominion by compact with Normandy to fis dominion by compete with Robert, who went on Crusade, compelled Malcolm of Scotland to do homage for his kingdom, conducted several campaigns against the Welsh, and had a long-continued wrangle with Archbishop Anselm, virtually in defence of the royal prerogative against the claims of the Church; he was accidentally shot while hunting in the New Forest, and buried in Winchester Cathedral; he was unmarried; in his reign the Crusades began, and Westminster Hall was built (1060-1100).

WILLIAM III., king of England, born in The Hague, son of William II., Prince of Orange, by Mary, the daughter of Charles I.; during a contest on the part of the United Provinces with Louis XIV. was. part of the United Provinces with Louis XIV. was, in 1672, elected Stadtholder, and by his valour and wisdom brought the war to an end in 1678; married his cousin Mary, daughter of James II.; being invited to England, landed with a large army being invited to England, induct which a large at Torbay, and on the flight of James to France, he and Mary were proclaimed King and Queen of Great Britain and Ireland in 1689; the Scots and the Irish offered resistance in the interest of the exiled monarch, but the former were defeated at Killiecrankie in 1689, and the latter at the battle of the Boyne in 1690; he was an able man and ruler, but his reign was troubled by an interminable feud with France, and by intrigues on behalf of James both at home and abroad; he died by a fall from his horse at Kensington just as a great war with France was impending; he was through life the adversary of the covetous schemes of Louis, and before his death he had prepared the materials of that coalition which, under Marlborough and Prince Eugene. brought Louis to the brink of ruin; his reign forms one of the greater epochs in the history of England, and his accession was the result of what is known as "the Glorious Revolution" (1650-1702).

WILLIAM IV. king of England, known as the "sallor king," born in Windsor, the third son of George III.; entered the navy in 1779; saw service under Rodney and Nelson, but practically retired in 1789, as from insubordination he had to do, though he was afterwards promoted to be Admiral of the Fleet, and even Lord High Admiral, and continued to take great interest in naval affairs: after living, as Duke of Clarence, from 1792 to 1816 with Mrs. Jordan, the actress, by whom he had 10 children, he married in 1818 Adelaide, eldest daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen; on the death of the Duke of York in 1827 became heirpresumptive, and on the death of George IV. in 1830 succeeded to the throne; his reign was distinguished by the passing of the first Reform Bill in 1832, the abolition of slavery in the colonies in 1832, the reform of the poor-laws in 1834, and the Municipal Reform Act in 1835; died at Windsor, and was succeeded by his niece Queen Victoria (1726, 1925).

WILLIAM I., German emperor, born in Berlin, second son of Frederick William III. of Prussia, and brother of Frederick William IV., his predecessor on the Prussian throne: was bred from boyhood to on the Prussian throne; was breat from boyhood to military life, having received his first commission at the age of 10; took part in the war of liberation that preceded the fall of Napoleon, and received his baptism of fire on Feb. 14, 1814; visited England in 1844, and again in 1848, and returned prepossessed in favour of constitutional government, which he found the king had already conceded in his absence; in 1858 he was appointed received with the found the king had already conceded in his absence; in 1858 he was appointed received with the found the king had already conceded in his absence; in 1858 he was appointed regent owing to his brother's incapacity, and on Feb. 2, 1861, he succeeded to the throne, having previously made the acquaintance of Moltke in 1818 and of Bismarck in 1834; on his accession, while professing all due respect to the representatives of the people, he announced his intention to maintain to the uttermost all his rights as king, maintain to the uttermost all his rights as king, and this gave rise to a threat of insurrection, but a war with Denmark, which issued in the recovery of the German duchies of Schleswig-Holstein, led to an outburst of loyalty, and this was deepened by the publication of the project of Bismarck to unite all Germany under the crown of Prussia; this provoked a war with Austria, which lasted only seven weeks, and ended with the consent of the latter to the projected unification of the other States, and the establishment of a confederation of these under the headship of the Prussian king, a unification which was consolidated into an imperial one at the close of the Franco-German War, when, on Jan. 18, 1871, the king of Prussia was proclaimed German Emperor in the palace of Versailles; the reign which followed was a peaceful one, and the pledge of peace to the rest of Europe; the emperor was a man of robust frame, of imposing figure, of temperate habits, of firm purpose, conspicuous courage, and devoted with his whole heart to the welfare of his people (1797-1888).

WILLIAM II., German emperor, born in Berlin, son of Frederick III., whom he succeeded as emperor in 1888, and grandson of the preceding, and through his mother of Queen Victoria; was trained from early boyhood for kinghood, and on his accession to the throne gave evidence of the schooling he had received to equip him for the high post he was called to fill; one of the first acts of his reign was to take upon himself the full responsibility for the home and foreign policy of the State, Bismarck being dismissed by him. Assuming the character of a friend of peace he continued the preparations for a great war which was to end in the triumph of Germany and make him the ruler of the world; by secret preparation and what he called peaceful penetration, and by unremitting interference in the penetration, and by unformating meta-trace in an affairs of other nations, encouraging disposites and discontents and stimulating disloyalty, he did his utmost to make peace impossible; and, finally, on Aug. 1, 1914, he began the first world war which ended in the wreck of his country and his own ruin; abdicated Nov. 9, 1918, and escaped into Holland, where he remained in exile. There was talk of bringing him for trial before an international court, but nothing came of it. It was his habit to pose as a strong man, but, although there is no doubt he could have prevented the war had he desired peace, he was as putty in the hands of his advisers; once the war had started he was, despite his pose as "War Lord," little more than a figure-bead. His incurable vanity was shown in the pathetic attempt to play the rôle of king in exile at Doorn after 1918; history will, perhaps, take the charitable view that his mind was diseased. He was twice married, (1) in 1831 to Augusta Victoria, Princess of Schleswig-Holstein (1858–1921), by rincess of Schieswig-Roistein (1883-1921), by whom he had six sons and one daughter, and (2) in 1922 to Hermine (1887-1947), widow of the Prince of Schönaich-Carolath (1859-1942).

WILLIAM THE LION, king of Scotland, grandson of David I., and brother of Malcolm IV., whom he succeeded in 1165, and whose surname is supposed to have been derived from his substitution of the lion for the dragon on the arms of Scotland: was taken captive when invading England at Alnwick Castle in 1174; sent prisoner to Falaise, in Normandy, but liberated on acknowledgment of vassalage to the English king, a claim which Richard I. surrendered on payment by the Scots of 10,000 marks to aid him in the Crusade; was the first king of Scotland to form an alliance with France; died at Stirling after a reign of 49 years

WILLIAM THE SILENT, Prince of Orange, a cadet of the noble house of Nassau, the first Stadtholder of the Netherlands, a Protestant by birth; he was brought up a Catholic, at the court of Charles V., but being at heart a patriot, he took up arms in the cause of his country's freedom, and did not rest till he had virtually freed it from the Spanish yoke; his enemies procured his assassina-tion in the end, and he was murdered by Belthazar Gerard at Delft; his circumspect demeanour in youth procured him the surname of Silent, but under the cold exterior he concealed a far-sighted intellect and a generous heart (1533-1584).

WILLIAMS, Roger, founder of the State of Rhode Island, U.S., born in Wales; being a Puritan, fled the country to escape persecution, and settled in New England, where he hoped to enjoy the religious freedom he was denied at home, but was received with disfavour by the earlier settlers as, from his extreme views, a "trouble of Israel," and obliged to separate himself and establish a colony of his own, which he did at Providence by favour of an Indian tribe with whom he had made friends, and under a charter from the Long Parliament of England, obtained through Sir Henry Vane, and thus enjoyed the toleration which he had extended to others; Milton, who knew him, called him "that noble champion of religious liberty" (1600-1683).

WILSON, Thomas Woodrow, 28th President, U.S.A. A professor by occupation, he first came into prominence politically in 1912 as governor of New Jersey, and the following year was elected President of the United States. Early in the first world war he brought pressure to bear on Germany in an effort to make her abandon attacks on noncombatants, and, these failing, he was largely responsible for his country's entry into the war in 1917. He came to Europe for the Peace Conference, where his most notable work was the inclusion in the Treaty of Versailles of the League of Nations Covenant; but he was acting without the authority of his legislature, and on his return American participation in the League was rejected. Wilson retired from office in 1921, and died three years later. A man of high ideals, it was he who coined the phrase "make the world safe for demo-cracy." It was during his term of office that Prohibition became the law of the U.S.A. (1856– 1924) 1924)

The foundations of wireless or radio-telegraphy were laid by the theoretical work of Clerk Maxwell (q.v.) and the experimental researches of Hertz (q.v.) on the electrical oscillations produced in the ether by a circuit in which an alternating current of high frequency was flowing; further advances were made by Sir Oliver Lodge, and the final steps needed to make wireless communication a practical proposition were made by Marconi (q.v.) in 1896 and the following years, the first messages to cross the Atlantic being transmitted in 1902, between Poldhu (Cornwall) and Canada; wireless telephony was made possible by the invention of the ther-mionic valve by J. A. Fleming, and the later three-electrode valve by Lee de Forest; by the beginning of the first world war most ships were equipped with wireless. The broadcasting of music, &c., com-menced in Great Britain in Nov., 1922, and the first telephone conversation by wireless between New York and London took place two years later. In 1922 the British Broadcasting Company was formed, this being taken over by the Government as the British Broadcasting Corporation in 1927.

WISDOM OF JESUS. See ECCLESIASTICUS. WISDOM OF SOLOMON, one of the most beautiful books in the Apocrypha, written at the close of the 2nd century B.C. by one who knew both the Greek language and Greek philosophy, to commend the superiority to this philosophy of the divine wisdom revealed to the Jews. Its general aim, as has been said, is "to show, alike from philosophy and history, as against the materialists of the time, that the proper goal of life was not mere existence, however long, or pleasure of any sort, but some-thing nobly intellectual and moral, and that the pious Israelite was on the surest path to its attainment."

WISEMAN, Nicholas Patrick Stephen, cardinal and Roman Catholic archbishop of Westminster, born in Seville, of Irish parents; studied at the English college at Rome, of which he became rector; lectured in London in 1836 on the Doctrines of the Catholic Church, and in 1840 became vicarapostolic, first in the central district of England then of the London district in 1846, and was in 1850 named archbishop of Westminster by the Pope; this was known in England as the "papal aggression," which raised a storm of opposition in the country, but this storm Wiseman, now cardinal, succeeded very considerably in allaying by a native courtesy of manner which commended him to the regard of the intelligent and educated classes of the community; he was a scholarly man, and a vigorous writer and orator (1802-1865).

WISHART, George, a Scottish martyr; began life as a schoolmaster; was charged with heresy for teaching the Greek New Testament; left the country and spent some time on the Continent; on his return boldly professed and preached the Reformation doctrines, and had the celebrated John Knox, who was tutor in the district, for a disciple among others; he was arrested in Haddingin March, 1546; Knox would fain have accompanied him on his arrest, but was paternally dissuaded by the gentle martyr; "Go home to your bairns" (pupils), said he; "ane is sufficient for a sacrifice" (circ. 1513-1546).
